

Appendix C. State Natural Areas and other Ecological Reference Sites by Ecological Landscape

State Natural Areas (SNA) are tracts of land or water that represent a diversity of Wisconsin's natural features and are relatively less impacted by human disturbance. They contain outstanding examples of native biotic communities, and are often the last refuges in the state for Endangered, Threatened, and Special Concern species. SNAs may also include exceptional geologic features. SNAs are parcels that can be visited and studied to better understand the ecology of areas with little past disturbance. Officially recognized SNAs and other potential ecological reference areas in combination provide a comprehensive array of sites to apply adaptive management strategies and science-based management. They also protect smaller scale sites such as rare plant habitat, coastal plain marshes, alvars, and meromictic lakes, which other public landowners do not actively attempt to protect.

SNAs and other ecological reference areas represent only a small portion of the total area of the state (less than 2%), and, as a result, are insufficient by themselves for sustaining all of the state's biological diversity. While some sites are relatively large, many are small and may be impacted by activities on surrounding lands. Even though they represent a small fraction of the state, they are unlike typical parcels of land. The sites are identified and established only after evaluating rigorous inventory and science-based criteria. The value of these sites for assuring the long-term sustainability of our states biological diversity lies in the local protection of rare habitats, and provision of benchmarks for considering management actions and templates for larger scale restorations on other parcels.

The following tables list ecological reference sites by Ecological Landscape that are representative of the major and important opportunity communities in each landscape.
